

English Research Database Orientation

- Database skills are useful in locating material that is generally not found through a search engine. They contain a variety of credible and updated information found in journals for research and educational purposes.
- Many of the databases contain the full-text of magazine and journal articles from publications that are also published in print.
- Books, reference sources, collections of art images, streaming video collections, and language tutorials are other types of content that are available thru databases.
- Databases are organized alphabetically and by subject.
- The alphabetical listing of databases is helpful if you already know the name of a specific database to use. Most of the time you will find it easier to explore the databases within a subject category that is related to the information you trying to locate.
- Literary Criticism is found in edited collections of criticism. To search enter the title of the short story, book, poem, or prose in the electronic book collections. To add a type of theme to your search type in the theme and the title of the selection you are researching (ex: survival "Hunger Games"); to search with the author's last name (Hansberry and "A Raisin in the Sun").
- Conducting a Literary Criticism Search- To locate literary criticism through an electronic database, click on the databases of your choice to begin searching. To search for a theme and a selection (jealousy AND "The Crucible") add the thematic element, the word AND before the title of the selection. Make sure the title of the selection is in quotation marks. One database will contain more critiques than others so it is important to extend your search between the various databases offered by the library. Databases may also duplicate articles. To avoid duplicate articles, try various synonyms or paraphrase to increase search results.

Book Sources:

- Ebrary and EBSCOhost eBooks are subscription e-book collections.
- Current CBC faculty, staff and students may borrow books from the Grady C. Hogue LRC & Library located at the Beeville Campus. The catalog is available for searching. The catalog includes the print book collection, educational video collection, and electronic books from Beeville, Alice, Kingsville, and Pleasanton.
- Electronic Books: Students use their CougarID to access electronic books and faculty/staff use their email name and password.
- Inter-library is a method that the library uses to borrow books and request copies of articles from print journals from other libraries. This is available thru TexShare, a lending library.
